"The best teachers are those who show you where to look but don't tell you what to see."

Alexandra K. Trenfor

Alexandra K. Trenfor once said: "The best teachers are those who show you where to look but don't tell you what to see". I think, the author wanted to say that a teacher, one of the most important people in life of a child, must show different aspects of life to a student, but never make him share the teacher's point of view. (62)

I totally agree with the author, that teacher must not tell their students what to think, because school is the place where a child learns to socialize, make friends and gain new experience and knowledge. So, it's crucial for a teacher to let students make their own opinions on different topics.

For example, in early USSR propaganda in school was really high, because it was important for the new government to make children, as the future of the country, think in the way it was appropriate for this government. That's why history teachers were lying about some historical facts and were showing the former government authorities as a bloody establishment that hadn't paid any attention to people's needs. Because of this many children were given with wrong information and any other point of view was forbidden.

Personally, my first school teacher was a very kind woman, who showed me different aspects of the world, explaining pros and cons of different actions, but she never told me how to act and what to think, that's why I consider her as the best teacher in my life.

In the end, I'd like to say that the role of a teacher in the child's life is really important, consequently, teacher is the person that should show where to look but never tell what to see.
